IRISH PARLIAMENT ELECTS COSGRAVE

Names Him President at First Session; Mulcahy Chosen Military Head.

FEW MEMBERS ABSENT

Lawrence Ginnell Denounces London Treaty and Is Ejected.

PEACE PLANS HINTED

Many Rumors of Settlement With Rebels Heard as Dail Meets.

Special Cable to THE NEW YORK HERALD. Copyright, 1922, by THE NEW YORK HERALD. New York Herald Bureau, Dublin, Sept. 9.

At the inaugural session of the new Irish Parliament under the Anglo-

Irish treaty to-day the power of the Government was placed in the hands of a little group headed by William T. Cosgrave, who was elected President of the Dail Eireann. Richard Mulcahy was made the military head and will have full power with Kevin O'Higgins, newly appointed Minister of Home Affairs, backing him with the police and detective forces.

The election and appointments took place after a long and dreary session, in which the absence of last year's big figures was painfully apparent. The only anti-treaty member present was the aged Lawrence Ginnell and he was ejected.

Mr. Cosgrave asserted that the program of the new Government would be first to carry out the treaty; second, to adopt a constitution, and, third, to restore order. He asked Parliament for any extraordinary powers necessary to speed the work of reconstruction and restoration.

Rebel Settlement Presided.

Despite the vigorous meaning of his words they were hardly spoken in a vigorous tone and throughout the meeting corridor gossip had it that there possibly would be a settlement with the rebels. The total attendance was 56, which included almost the full treaty strength. Nevertheless, vigorous opposition developed among the labor members and there was much captious criticism of the government's own warm supporters—men like Eiggis and Gavan Duffy. The government was forced to revamp its final plans so as to allow the farmer, labor and independent parties to nominate their own members for the standing orders committee to draw the assembly's rules. It was in handling the opposition that the new cabinet missed Michael Collins and Arthur Griffith.

Ginnell, just back from Argentina, is an expert at getting expelled, having been the only Sinn Fein member ever to appear in the Westminster Parliament, from which he was ejected several times in 1914 because he refused to obey the rules. To-day he paced nervously up and down in back of the chamber until the meeting assembled and then, after the roll had been signed by all the others, he announced that he would not sign and demanded again and again to be informed whether this was a meeting of the Dail to which he was elected or a partition parliament, in which he refused to sit. He shouted interruptions until the sergeant at arms touched his shoulder. Then, deadly pale, he seized his chair and began to defend himself until fighting, he was carried from the chamber. The pathetic figure of the old man fighting the burly guards brought cries of "Gently, gently," from all parts of the house.

This gave a fine opportunity for an eloquent presentation of the rebel contention that this Parliament does not represent the will of the people and is not really the Dail Eireann, but none was forthcoming. If any figure merged from the entire drama proceedings into anything like an engaging light it was that of Mulcahy. The house felt the magnetism of his presence when he arose to pay a touching tribute to "the greatest sower and the greatest reaper Ireland had ever known," as he called Griffith and Collins in a voice that shook with emotion. He followed this with a stirring appeal for support of the treaty in order to protect Ireland from external foes and for support of the Government and army to protect her from internal foes, "or, rather, from our very bad internal friends."

Mulcahy refused to join the issue when Johnson, leading the Labor members, demanded leniency and efforts to reach a compromise with the rebels. With Desmond Fitzgerald's ability finally rewarded by his appointment to the post of Foreign Minister, the ruling of the other officers represented merely the shuffling necessary to fill the places of former ministers who are in active service or those wishing to retire.

E. J. Duggan, the last surviving signer of the treaty, was made minister without portfolio for the avowed purpose of maintaining touch with Downing Street.

Despite the large critical minority to-day the house generally supported the Government unanimously when it came to a vote, except that the Labor party cast sixteen votes against making Mulcahy Minister of Defense while he was still Commander in Chief of the army. Had the anti-treaty members been present the Government undoubtedly could have counted on a safe majority right through the proceedings. The ministers in discussing the situation afterward insisted that they are determined to carry on a vigorous campaign to restore order.

They make no secret of the fact that this is little to their taste, however, and many members are expressing doubt as to the wisdom of continuing the fight against the rebels. Next week's sessions when Mulcahy may be expected to ask for the additional powers he deems necessary, will tell how far the Government has really determined to go and how far the Dail will follow.

Naming the Cabinet.
DUBLIN, Sept. 9 (Associated Press).—After the election President Cosgrave nominated Desmond Fitzgerald as Minister of Foreign Affairs, and Fitzgerald was elected.

The remaining Ministers were appointed as follows: Minister of Home Affairs, Kevin O'Higgins; Minister of Local Government, Ernest Blythe; Minister of Agriculture, Patrick Hogan; Minister of Industry, Commerce and Labor, Joseph McGrath; Postmaster-General, J. J. Walsh; Ministers Without Portfolio, Eamon J. Duggan and Finian Lynch; Minister of Education, Prof. John McNeill; Minister of Defense, Gen. Richard Mulcahy.

President Cosgrave nominated himself for the present as Minister of Finance. He said that those of the new Ministry who were serving in the army would shortly be released. The labor vote was cast solidly against the appointment of Walsh as Postmaster-General.

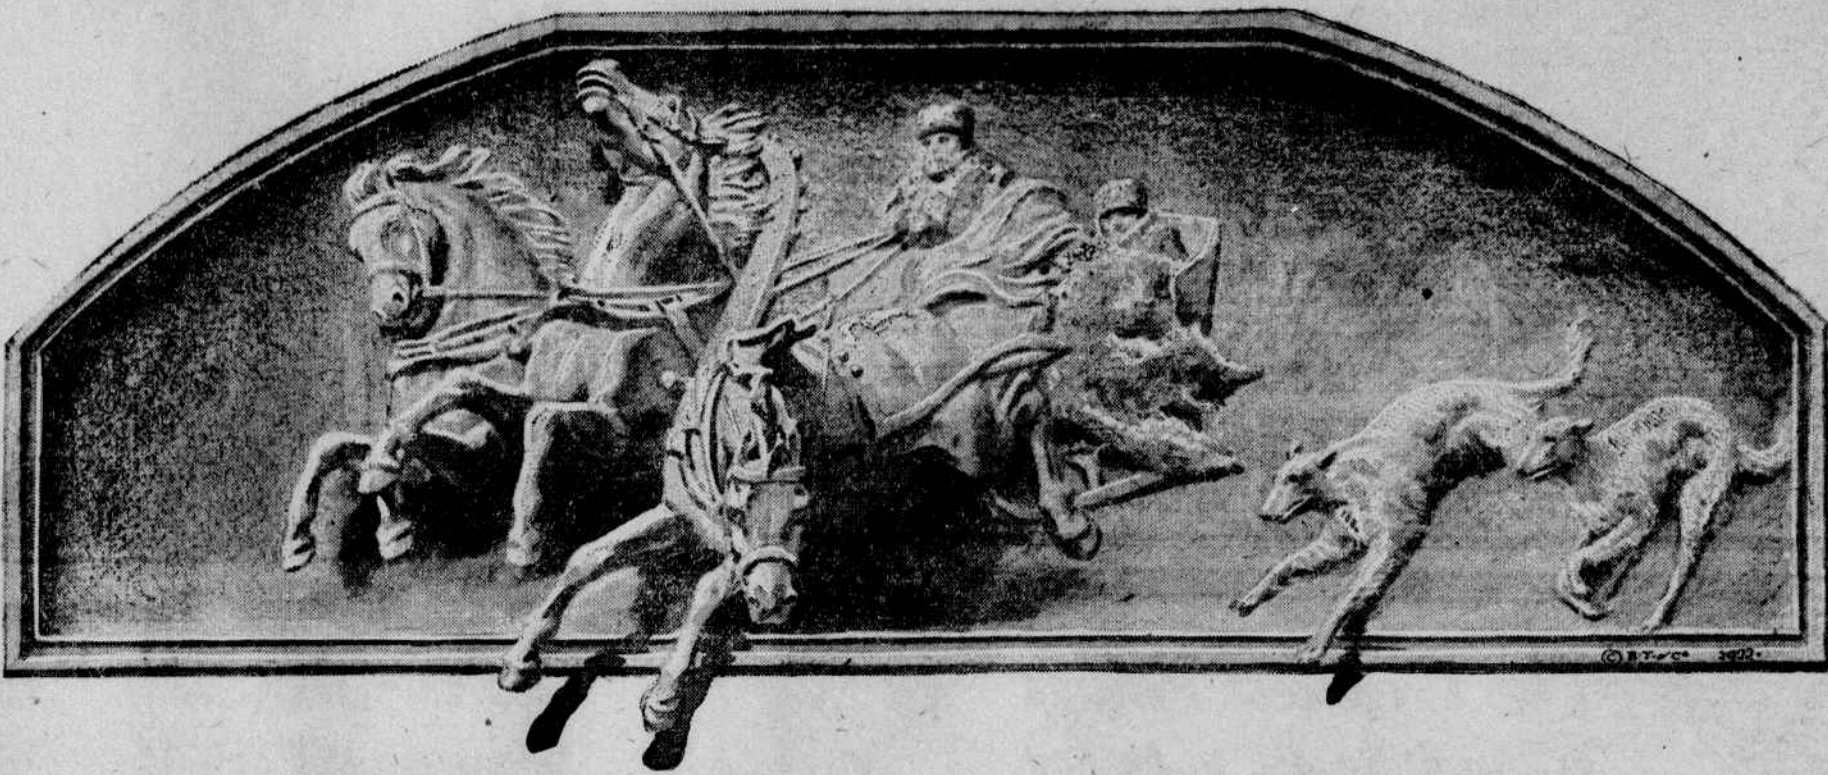

IRISH POSTAL UNIONS WILL STRIKE TO-DAY

Mail, Telephone and Telegraph Services Affected.

DUBLIN, Sept. 9 (Associated Press).—The joint executive bodies of the Irish Postal Unions decided this evening that all their members in the postal, telephone and telegraph services shall cease work at 6 o'clock Sunday evening. Following a reduction in pay a joint board failed to reach a compromise.

CONFECTIONERS TO MEET.

The annual convention of the Confectioners and Ice Cream Manufacturers Association of the State of New York will be held at the Hotel Astor Thursday afternoon. Winning designs for candy models to be exhibited by members of the association throughout the State on candy day, October 14, will be announced. Among the candy models submitted are those of the Curtis glider and the girl with the long dress and the open sleeves.
